ABSTRACT

The purpose of this study was to find out and analyze how the implementation of food security policies at the South Kalimantan Provincial Food Security Service and how the inhibiting and supporting factors for implementing food security policies at the South Kalimantan province food security service.

The research method uses a qualitative approach with a descriptive type of research conducted for 3 (three) months.

The results showed that the implementation of the Food Security Policy at the South Kalimantan Provincial Food Security Service, which was run by the South Kalimantan Provincial Food Security Service, had been supported by human resources for civil servants and non-civil servants as well as the availability of a budget for the implementation of food security policies and the existence of rules and performance targets. clear in carrying out the work. In terms of communication, human resources, bureaucratic structure and disposition received positive perceptions from the community because they were considered to help food security and community income in the South Kalimantan region and Supporting factors due to the availability of land, budget and support from the government in the Food Security program in South Kalimantan as well as obstacles to policy implementation Food in South Kalimantan is in terms of consumption and food safety, currently the fast food industry is starting to grow and has more and more consumers every day, this is a major obstacle in food policy because most of the industries used are imported, starting from imports. from spices to other raw materials, besides that, because the influence of international food trade cannot be ignored, Indonesian people who are not aware of the love of local products are more proud of imp products or other than that the latter will have an impact on consumers. food safety, namely the spread of hazardous chemicals for food along with increasing basic needs that have so far been a lot of dangerous chemicals available in the market that are cheaper and have a comfortable taste.
